CEPT AND CREATIVE PRACTICE

Team leadership and visual practice outside work

FC Sparta captaincy and an ongoing painting practice alongside the professional product portfolio.

Role: Football captain / independent artist | Period: University and independent practice

Reported outcomes and scope

3 consecutive · Reported football championships

Oil painting

Independent visual practice described in the Professional Profile.

The product problem

Team culture and creative making provide different ways to work through a problem. The Professional Profile describes a struggling college football team and a painting practice maintained alongside the professional career.

My role

I captained FC Sparta at CEPT University and maintain an independent painting practice, mainly in oils. Both sit outside my employment record and provide personal context alongside the product portfolio.

What I built

The football account describes taking over a team that had finished near the bottom and subsequently winning three consecutive championships. Captaincy is the contribution retained here, without adding an undocumented training or selection method.

Painting remains an active independent visual practice. Actual work and images can show its character more clearly than a commercial design claim; the practice is included as a personal part of the portfolio.

What changed

Three consecutive championships are reported in the supplied profile. No quantified result is attached to the painting practice, and neither activity is used as a substitute for evidence of professional team management.

The lesson from this work

This supporting case shows interests and leadership outside formal product roles. Its contribution to the portfolio is personal context supported by actual work and records, rather than an invented causal link to later business performance.

Evidence and attribution

These are university and personal activities outside employment.
