The documented independent advisory scope.

The product problem

Early founders need to connect the product idea with customer demand and an operating business. The Professional Profile describes advisory activity in areas where product, economics and go-to-market decisions are tightly linked.

My role

I advise early-stage founders across FMCG, energy and carbon-credit ventures. The work described in the Professional Profile covers product direction and operating questions; the clients are unnamed and this is independent advisory activity.

What I built

The advisory subjects are zero-to-one product strategy, unit economics, go-to-market planning and fundraising narrative. These connect the product idea with the customer, the cost of serving that customer and the explanation of the business to outside stakeholders.

This is supporting advisory activity drawn from founder and product experience. Individual client recommendations and implementation stories are not disclosed, so named engagements and client results remain outside this case.

What changed

There is no disclosed quantified client outcome. The value demonstrated here is the breadth of operating questions addressed, while named client proof and adopted-decision examples remain outside the supplied record.

The lesson from this work

This work is a supporting part of the portfolio. It connects prior founder and product experience with the questions an early venture faces, while preserving a boundary between advice given and results delivered by another company.

Evidence and attribution

Independent advisory is distinct from employment or a disclosed commissioned client case.
