The product problem

UrbanKhet began with terrace farming, while the customer need extended to having fresh produce without doing the growing work. Perishable food creates a tight connection between the order promise, sourcing, harvest timing and delivery.

My role

I founded UrbanKhet and owned its proposition, web product, customer acquisition, farmer sourcing, team, fulfilment and P&L. I worked directly with early customers and farmers, building the digital order journey and the physical operation as one business.

What I built

The business pivoted into a farm-to-fork supply chain serving households and businesses. Customer orders were connected to sourcing and delivery through decentralised distribution, operating procedures and a web product.

The records report a 28-person team and a farmer network built through outreach and local relationships. Enterprise customers included Marriott, BigBasket, Udaan and Ninjacart alongside the consumer business.

From terrace farming to a paid customer promise

UrbanKhet began with terrace farming. The later proposition served consumers who wanted fresh produce without taking on the work of growing it. I acquired the first 44 customers manually and developed farmer supply through cold outreach and local relationships. Those activities built the initial demand and supply sides before the venture had an established customer base.

I pivoted towards direct farm-to-consumer distribution, then developed household subscription plans and business demand around the same sourcing operation. Serving a household and serving a hotel or marketplace created different buyer relationships, while both depended on produce arriving in usable condition. I owned business development and the fulfilment behind those commitments.

A web product supported by distributed operations

I developed the web product and operating workflows, with decentralised urban distribution in Maharashtra and Gujarat described in the Professional Profile. Sourcing, inventory, harvest timing and last-mile delivery had to work together. SOPs gave the team repeatable routines rather than making the customer promise depend only on individual improvisation.

The March 2022 CV reports a maximum of 10% wastage, compared with a stated 35% industry benchmark. That is a level achieved in the described operation, not a company before-and-after reduction. The later profile describes a six-hour harvest-to-home model. Both belong to the physical service design, where quality, timing and cost affected the venture’s economics.

What changed

The venture reports a 28-person team, more than 3,600 clients and 45 business customers. Marriott, BigBasket, Udaan and Ninjacart are among the named accounts. The farmer network is reported at more than 3,000. These are distinct views of the business: the team delivering it, the demand it served and the suppliers it connected.

The lesson from this work

The founder contribution is the connection between a digital product and its physical promise. Customer learning, supplier trust, team routines and unit economics all shape whether an order can be fulfilled reliably.

□1.2 crore is labelled P&L scope in one CV and ARR in another, so it is omitted as a headline financial result. Customer counts vary by source/period. The 35% waste comparator is an asserted industry benchmark; farmer-income comparisons and six-hour delivery are self-reported.
